Q: How to force a submenu to stay on the left instead of appearing as a list I am starting to learn Drupal. I am building a test website on Drupal 6 to learn how to build websites. I have not really tried at making a complex website. The problem I have at the moment is that I want to have a submenu on the left of my main menu. However, I am having trouble controlling the appearance of the submenu. Let me show you some screenshots: Here is my main menu: And my submenu: Since the submenu is a div, I believe it is using a list. I want the submenu to appear on the left. So I have the submenu-left class added to the submenu div. Please Help! A: Try setting the menu-header class on your main menu, so that it looks

What's New in the Installer Maker?

Installer Maker is a user-friendly application that enables you to package your project and make it distribution-ready. When creating your installer, you get to choose the PC architecture it supports, as well the EULA text or the icon. My Subversion repository has a single project It has a test-site.master file, a database, a build-site.master file, a deployment-site.master file and a deployment.ps1 I want to create a single installer for each of the following scenarios One installer that i can modify if need be, for a specific server configuration. I have a server that has 6 different environments and a different project for each. I have a production server that has 3 different configurations and a different project for each. How can i create the installer so that i can configure it with server-level information through the setup project? A: Two things you need to consider: What are you trying to achieve? Is there an end goal? Have you determined your requirements for an installer? You can create one using features like clickonce, which are simple, but require some expertise to create. You can create a setup project and then use an add-in to create an MSI. These two are much more forgiving and out of the box. You could also use a simple batch file and cmd script. If you are trying to create an installer, the first thing that comes to my mind is through the setup project, you can edit the pre- or post-packages that are called on various events. You could write code-behind for various elements and tie it to the project settings if you want to create your custom settings in the installer or have them be part of the project settings. I don't necessarily think the first question matters if the answer to number two is no. I had an app I installed a while ago and had to update the MSI because it was messy and the feature I wanted was in pre- or post-packages instead of a manifest. It would be easy to create an installer using something other than a setup project, but I haven't done that in a while, so I can't tell you specifics. Good luck. I have 3 projects that I have created an installer for that I can't remember the details of, but that probably didn't help any. Medical Malpractice Insurance in Mississippi Medical mal
