A game of eliminating tiles from a map gives rise to one of the earliest and most famous game shows of all time, "The $64,000 Question". Quiz show producers eventually would try to find out a contestant's IQ, by using many different kinds of test questions. The television quiz show was started in 1956 by Alan Kamen, who was a sports executive. Kamen's game show production company, Pyramid Productions, was able to promote successful "Tic-Tac-Dough", a board game. He decided to take the game show format to television and the idea, of "$64,000 Question", was born. In the beginning, the show was hosted by Merv Griffin. Although the original format of the show was very simple, the title changed as its popularity grew. So, in 1959, Alan Price hosted "The $64,000 Question". As the show's success grew, more contestants joined the show. In the 1960s, the title was changed once again to "The $64,000 Challenge", then finally, it became "The $64,000 Question". The Gary and the Spacemen band won a television contract with NBC in 1966. Bill Cullen's fame was not just limited to the United States. During the 1960s, young actors took the host role. Jon-Erik Hexum, in 1967, was a drama student at the University of California at Los Angeles. His host partner was Dorothy Fonseca. Actress Joan Collins also was the host from 1968-1970. With no other career options, she took the role of hostess, as her only job. The show had a British version, too. In 1967, a female host named Gloria Hunniford hosted the show.
